

The Passage of Time; Renewed Thoughts on Nature

17/05/2020

As things change and the world does so as well, faster than the birth of new individuals, Time always goes on no matter what happens. But, it seems that its perception from others is different. Maybe time passes by all the same, but as we get used to it and suffer through it, how it is perceived changes.

Not necessarily how fast it passes by, that does not change on this Earth. But how fast we forget about what came and how we worry less about what is to come: This is the difference. As wisdom is the offspring and suffering and time, perhaps this is what it is. A secondary component to being wise is having this feeling that time passes by faster, even if it has not changed.

The best ways to change perception is to suffer over time. Minutes will be long and hours feel like an eternity, but after a while we get used to whatever degree of prolonged suffering we were subjected to.

Another way, that may be needed to balance out this perception, is to be deeply interested in something and not feel the time passing by at all. But, I believe that once this high has passed, the lessons that could be derived from it for the passage of time are forgotten. It would make sense, as well. While suffering we want to end it in some capacity, and we know that eventually, it will end. And this eventuality is determined by the passage of time, and we think of it in varying degrees of frequency. But, if we are drawn to a fascinating task or subject and all of our being is poured into it, then Time is not thought of, unless it is used as a limiter. In which case it is only considered as a hindrance rather than possible relief and teacher.

What I would like to know, is how fast do the people who suffered the most feel time pass by. These people also tend to be deeply scarred early in their lives, either by choice, or by outside influences, or a mixture of both. Although this is a subject I already touched on previously, this is more of a curiosity on the matter.

And now I wonder if this feeling of a faster and faster passing of time is necessarily a monochrome issue. Or if it's an issue at all. Obviously, it sounds to be a natural thing to happen, as life is, even if we choose to live it away from all, a hard thing to cope with and live through happily. It requires constant self-updating through introspection by noticing ourselves or by getting feedback from others. And, of course, a deeper and deeper understanding of the World around us and within us as life goes on for us. Until the end, growth is priority, so that our death can be grandiose, and we could say that maybe, in the end, our life was worth living and fighting for.

But, as Asbeel taught the Grigori, albeit he might not have been the greatest of teachers and/or leader, beyond all of our grief and joys there exists a truth deeper than the one of life. The eventuality that has to be accepted after this short display of something unusual. Order was not created out of chaos, rather chaos was created out of chaos, entropy contained within shells that simulated its opposite. Whatever happens after this roaring fire (although on a small scale) will be completely different from what we were taught as a species since the dawn of Man. We were only taught about what we are, what we were as we lived and what we could be as we survive, until it is over. But nothing beyond life. We can observe what ruin looks like, but to comprehend it, how deep do we have to reach within ourselves?

This is not the type of darkness that enables acts of cruelty or visions of death and how to cope with our passing. It is something further out than that, something that I believe we do not want to comprehend at our core. There must exist mental and existential barriers preventing us from truly reaching this truth of the universe. An internal truth deep within the core of our DNA, something that exists scattered between the atoms we are made of. Something completely out of mathematics. And perhaps that is why we may never reach out beyond: Science has determined life to be based on mathematics, because science became completely barren of anything that could be even considered outside of the material and that could be put into numbers for us to read and understand. Abstract does not exist anymore, and anything that might be abstract MUST become material.

Human life, just as well, became material, numbers and a statistic amongst billions of others. Individual value was lost when Man decided to not compare itself to Nature or God, but to compare itself to itself. Exaltation is not possible anymore, as we can only improve ourselves and always go beyond. But this improvement is only biological, and can never be spiritual. Man is seen as a machine and nothing else anymore. Science has deemed that only the material is worth studying because only material can be understood. And yet, this method of understanding only takes into account one dimension, what it deems to be worthwhile. Anything that is not the material is seen as useless and is put aside and labelled as occult. Philosophy even is labelled as such. But balance is key to everything, and if there is nothing but material, how can anything can really be understood? How vain does Humanity has to be to even believe that Nature can be challenged and fought against? I thought it was possible, very much so. But now I realize that we are not meant to fight against Nature or Time. But we are meant to walk hand in hand with Mother, so that we become equal to it, and we understand it, and this new future understanding that could have been, would have changed our perception of Nature, and she would have changed her perception of us. We could have named her Sister, instead. But as things seem to not stop progressing, and acceleration is only going to make us descend rather than ascend, I believe that it is much too late for everyone. Is it possible, however, for certain individuals to reach out and be equal with Sister, and work as a newly formed brotherhood, designed to take on the understanding of Entropy and perpetuate what was started such a long time ago?

Maybe that's it: Mother is not to be demonized. Maybe this is the growth needed by Humanity. Exaltation was not meant to be achieved in a way that would break every barriers of life. Exaltation was meant, before humanism changed its definition, to be equal with Nature and work alongside it to make the eternity of Time have company. So that we would not simply be a blimp. Perhaps, if there is a will to Nature, she understood that Time may have liked some company, but at this point this is only characterization, and it is very much likely, in my opinion, that Time really is "only" a constant of the universe and is beyond all understanding.

The past cannot be and should not be full of regrets. Where would we be as individuals if it wasn't for the suffering we went through? The joyous days and moments we felt as we wanted to go forward? Does technology have anything to do with enabling those moments to be more frequent, or did they make them less frequent?

Nature will keep living within us no matter what happens, no matter which path transhumanism takes us. As it cannot be stopped, Nature cannot be either. Only, we will be considered a failed attempt, and when Entropy comes as a devouring abyss, we will learn then that we were wrong. But, if there is something more than the material, maybe then this will go on. And, perhaps, this makes any believers in afterlife correct.

Does Time have a beginning? Does it have an end? I cannot remember when I began and I cannot tell when I will end.

If Humanity as a whole can only achieve a singularity that will prove no matter what to be self-destructive, perhaps individuals who became fluent in all the primary aspects of life, who became virtuous; Divine individuals (which can be considered as exaltation within the rules of Nature) with a deep understanding of the material, spiritual and any aspects that I am deeply unfamiliar with or cannot name for a lack of knowledge (could "Ruin" be an aspect?), maybe they will be the ones to be able to call Mother, their Sister instead. But within their solitary comprehension, all they could do is look with sorrow upon the eventual state of Humanity.

This is a deeply fatalistic attitude I took on, something I would not have liked before. But this is not fatalistic against life, but against the eventuality that comes for us. Not this age perhaps, but the next generations will lose themselves in drunken stupor of the impossible growth of Man against itself. You cannot forsake Nature like this, it is fruitless, and we are already seeing rot appear on our leathery skin.

An understanding of all aspects of life starts with the understanding of both material and life. Pursuit of only one brings unfulfilled potential, and leads down the wrong path. As our road was already paved long ago, and as humans, we were meant to take it. Technology by itself was not a bad thing. Industrialisation is not the devil that made everything explode into an abomination. It came to be centuries beforehand, with thinkers and scientists changing, eventually for all of us, the way life was thought of. How much knowledge has been discarded simply because it is not deemed as appropriate for the modern man? Again, why has philosophy been labelled as occult? And yet, we still teach it, we still reach for it and we still practice it without any condemnation from anyone who's not deeply indoctrinated in modern science. Which, funnily enough, is still to this day most of the population (who actually matter and don't waste their life away, willingly, no better than a roach looking for its next meal to feel good).

Yet, philosophers must not be seen as role models or mentors, for their role is not to be teachers, but to give their view on life and truth. It may be wrong, it may be right. As we change as individuals, our philosophy changes with us, and it would be foolish to always be entrenched in the same position AND reject any other view that contradict or question our own. If we were meant to exalt in Nature, if we are indeed beings with great capacity to be divine, then we have to keep empathy in balance as well, and understand each other to a point where it will be easy who is on this path that was made for us. Perhaps we can also learn from other animals, like Elephants, for their emotional capacity is higher than us as human beings. We may be the most dominant lifeforms on this planet, maybe even in the Universe, but this doesn't mean we can't improve. Only thing is, we have to grow with Nature to understand what it is, what it wants and what to do. Improving for the sake of our own improvement will, I repeat once more, lead to ruin. We may end the material side of Nature, but by forsaking the other aspects, Nature will always be present and come back in a way that will punish this complete 90° turn away from the path that was prepared for us. Maybe a violent way to put us back on the path.

We say Mother as it is caring, in its own way, but perhaps for reasons that are not meant to be seen as love. We could consider them to be selfish, but if we are from Nature, then are they really? And, funnily enough, is it not even moreso of a selfish endeavour to only care for ourselves and only want to improve for our sake?

On a side note, a quick thing to say about animal lovers and those who argue for their rights. Considering animals to be on the same level as human beings in their preferential treatment, who are you to say that? Who makes you speak in such ways? Who gave you divine authority to decide such things? The behaviour of animals has nothing to do with what humans are meant to achieve. They are needed, as we grew alongside them and were in a way born from them, but so are plants. Plants are as important as animals, and you may even be able to argue that they are moreso. And yet, they are another lifeform that seemingly has no will of its own, unable to understand what it is meant to do.

I truly do believe that Humanity is the one species, as a whole, that is meant to be lead to exaltation. We were supposed to finally appreciate and work with Sister, and have a kind relationship. It would make no real sense for Nature to not entice us to have emotions. These go beyond survival of species, or satisfaction of needs, or even to help our next of kin. There are certain behaviours that cannot be explained by maths and science. There are things that cannot be explained by a material type of science. This modern view of every single thing is not what we were meant to have.

But, perhaps this period is needed. Perhaps we will find a way. Perhaps we did need to expend on the material as much as we could, and maybe we will come back to a balanced view of things, and science will go back to this balance. If this is what is going to happen, if we really do not end ourselves through our own hubris, then Sister may actually be something that will happen. Of course, we can never be certain, but a ray of hope is all that is needed for us to keep going. Divinity has to be achieved, and once it is, then exaltation can be pursued to its full extent. As an entire world, perhaps that cannot happen, maybe one or more countries will make it. Maybe it won't be countries, but communities. An individual sometime somewhere will lead and help others to ascend and be with him, and all will become true Brothers and Sisters. Nature, of course, would be included in this.

However, today and at this hour, seeing what happens around the world, through the eyes of those in power or the average individual, I cannot in good conscience affirm for certain that we will go down this path. Most of what I see is the end of an era, and possibly of what could be. I do not want to go out and say "It might have been". But perhaps it will happen. The next cycle of civilization is the mob rule, but with governments trying to grab more power, maybe we will be set back for some more time. Which is a shame, as I wanted to see the aftermath of a mob rule. The ascension towards what could be. This could happen, but will it?
